

WESTWARD/WESTWARDS

Most often westward is used as the object of a preposition (indicating both the direction of some sort of movement or the location or relation of fixed objects): 23 times (out of 33) with "to", twice as the object of "from" (See: YTH-MS-1, VICTPR13), and once with "for" (See: LJ-MS-23). Other instances of westward vary with regard to parts of speech, modifying both nouns and verbs (See: AF-MS-02, OIMSPR10, FRS-MS-1, FRSTSR-1, AF-TSR02). Ditto for westwards (See: SA-MSK02, .p22 and .p 24) Maybe.

AF-MS-08, .p27

He looked at the body
laying straight and rigid under its white cover on which the sun declining amongst the clouds to the westward threw a pale tinge of red.

AF-MS-02, .p13

Europe had swallowed up the Rajah Laut apparently; and Almayer looked vainly westward
for a ray of light out of the gloom of his shattered hopes.

AF-MS-05, .p7

He gave the young chief -- when meeting him -- an absent greeting and passed on seemingly wishing to avoid him,
bent upon forgetting the hated reality of the present by absorbing
.p7
himself in his work or else by letting his imagination soar far above the tree-tops, into the great white clouds, away to the westward, where the paradise
of Europe was awaiting the future
eastern millionaire.

YTH-MS-1, .p20

It lasted all down the North Sea
all down Channel; and it lasted till we were a hundred miles or so to the westward of
of the Lizards; then the wind went round to the sou'west and
.p21

[Page 21]

began to pipe up.

YTH-MS-1, .p54

It was nearly calm except for a long swell from the westward making the ship roll.

AF-TSR05, .p79

When meeting
the young chief he gave him an absent greeting and passed on
.p79
seemingly wishing to avoid him, bent upon forgetting the hated reality of the present by absorbing himself in his work, or else

by letting his imagination soar far above the tree-tops, into the great white clouds, away to the westward, where the paradise of Europe was awaiting the future eastern millionaire.

AF-TSR08, .p160

He
looked at the body laying straight and rigid under its white cover on which the sun, declining amongst the clouds to the westward, threw a pale tinge of red.

AF-TSR09, .p09

A big white cloud sailed slowly across the darkening sky, and hung to the westward as if waiting for the sun to join it there.

VICTPR13, .p41

Captain Davis coming by from the westward saw him with his own eyes.

VICTPR31, .p262

The desolation of the headquarters of the Tropical Belt Coal C/O had been, as the good Captain Davidson had reported in various centres of civilisation, screened from the side of the sea, the side of the light of day, from of the horizon to the westward where under, far below, the ex-chare-holders were beginning to forget its fatal existence; from the side where prying eyes (if any there were interested sufficiently either in malice, or in sorrow) could have noted the decaying bones of that sanguine enterprise: {op"} the great step forward for these regions," which had cost that excentric seaman-trader, glass-eye Morrison, nothing less than his life.

VICTPR35, .p361

On their way to regain the forest path they had to pass through the spot from which the view to the westward could be obtained.

NN-MS-03, .p51

Anxious eyes
looked to the westward towards the cape of storms.

NOSTHR33, .p72

The peculiar dawn of Sulaco which seems to break far away to the westward and creep back into the shade of the mountains mingled with the reddish light of the candles.

NSTSHR33, .p5s(72)

The peculiar dawn of Sulaco which seems to break far away to the westward and creep back into the shade of the black mountains mingled with the reddish light of the candles.

OIMSPR10, .p144

He visited Bombay and Calcutta, looked in at the Persian gulf -- beheld in due course the high and barren coasts of the gulf of Suez, and this was the limit of his wanderings westward.

OIMSPR16, .p269

-- {op"} To the westward" explained Almayer under his breath.
{op"} she remembers everything.

RESTR21, .p2

The diffused light of the short daybreak showed the open water to the westward, sleeping, smooth and grey, under a faded heaven.

RESTR-1, .p4

There was no wind, and a small brig that had lain all the afternoon a few miles to the Northward and Westward of Carimata had hardly altered its position half a mile during all these hours.

RESTR-1, .p5

Nothing but the sun that seemed to be slipping slowly, imperceptibly and helplessly down towards the sharp edge of the vast expanse of open water stretching to the westward.

RESTR-1, .p5

Since midday, when the light an capricious airs of these seas had abandoned the little brig to its lingering fate, her head had swung slowly to the westward, and the end of her slender and polished jib-boom projecting boldly beyond the graceful curve of the bow, seemed to point at the setting sun, like a spear poised high in the hand of an enemy.

ROM-MS-03, .p512

The two vagneros after seeing the schooner hull down to the westward under the low fiery sun of that day mounted and rode over the plain for the head of the ravine on their way home. Skirting the side opposite to the cave, one of them caught sight of the length of rope dangling down the precipice.

ROMMSD03, .p512

the two vagneros after seeing the schooner hull down to the westward under the low fiery sun of that day mounted and rode for home over the plain.

*

and rode over the plain for the head of the ravine on their way home. Skirting its edges on the side opposite side to the cave, what one of them was the  length of rope.

ROVTSR12, .p231

The great cloud had broken up and the mighty fragments were moving to the westward in stately flight before the rising moon.

ROVTSR15, .p306

I can't find that out unless I go up to the farm and get a view to the westward. It may be as far as the Rho{cir}ne Valley; no doubt it is and it will come out of it too, curses on it.

LJ-MS-23, .p486

A brigantine of Stein's was leaving for the westward that afternoon and he had to take his passage in her.

SA-MSK02, .p22

cop}Such was the house
the household
and the business
Mr Verloc left behind him on his way westwards at the hour of eleven in the morning.

SA-MSK02, .p24

Mr Verloc
was going westwards through a town without shadows in an atmosphere of powdered old gold.

SLTSYU-1, .p42

She lay with her head to the westward, the everlasting Koh-ring visible over the stern, with a few small islets, black spots in the great blaze, swim* ming before my troubled eyes.

SLTSYU-1, .p7a

But suppose that I had mi it?
Used tose capricious gusts of wind to sail away to the westward into some region wehre there was not a breath of air for days on end, what then? Perhaps my horrible vision of a ship floating with a dead crew would become a reality for the discovery weeks afterwards of some
.p8a
horror-struck mariners.

FRS-MS-1, .p8

In the morning when she came out on the verandah for the first look westward Sumatra way over the sea
she seemed as fresh, and sparkling as a dew drop.

FRSTSR-1, .p5

In the morning when she came out on the verandah for the first look westward, Sumatra way, over the sea, she seemed as fresh and sparkling as a dew-drop.

POMTSU-2, .p75

He managed to smile but didn't correct himself .. . " has gone in   on a short tour of the islands to the westward."

AF-TSR02, .p33

Europe
had swallowed up the Rajah Laut apparently, and Almayer looked vainly westward, for a ray of light, out of the gloom of his shattered hopes.